JUNE GRADS jump right into jobs as firms de-emphasize training.

U. S. Steel experiments with putting its collegiate class of '67 recruits directly to work, skipping former lengthy training courses. AT&T's newcomers will find the stress on "performance" rather than on "observation," an official says. Youngstown Sheet & Tube cuts its training program to 25 weeks from 52. "We need these new guys and want to get them in a productive capacity as quickly as possible," explains a Youngstown spokesman.

College graduates "are already educated up to their eyeballs and want to go to work," notes a Polaroid official; the company immediately places grads in "challenging jobs" to avoid "disillusioning them." Sundstrand Corp. finds its optional training programs attract only about 10% of the recruits. Boise-Cascade figures it "learns much more about the man during this looking-over-his-shoulder period" than in any training course.

Though some employers welcome the newcomers' aggressiveness, a Univac man notes: "While management expects a bit of aggressiveness, it also expects it to disappear in six months."

Remarks:
Red: The attached article from the Wall Street Journal of 20 June 1967 tends to bear out one of the points we made in our CT Survey on training. It also confirms what [] told me with regard to preliminary findings of a survey he is doing on the length of training periods in private industry; namely, that the trend today is to deemphasize formal training and put the trainees to work as soon as possible. JSE
